The above name will ever appear among those of the early experimenters in steam navigation. On the 26th of August 1791, the United States granted a patent to Rumsey for improvements county, Maryland, about the year 1743. He removed to Berkley county, Virginis, where he resided at the time he turned his attention to steam navigation. In March 1786 he propelled small boat, made according to his in vention, on the Potomac river, and in December 1787 the experiment on a larger scale was repeated.

In 1788 he went to London, England, where a boat with the necessary ma-chinery was constructed for him, and about this time patents were procured for the invention in Great Britain, France and Holland. A successful trip with a boat made in London was con-ducted on the Thames in the early part of December 1792.

While preperations for further experiments connected with the invention were being made, the inventor, James Rumsey, died; the date of his death being December 23d, 1793. Mr. Rumsey had struggled against great opposition and adverse circumstances in order to reach the summit of his faith, and make the world better and happier, but like many of the pioneer inventors he fell just when he thought he was in sight of the reward of his toils.
