THE Point of View Editor says in October Scribner: There are several reasons why principles are more apt to appear as a substitute for morals than to accompany them. For one, a man whose dally walk is discreet, and who behaves wisely and knows it, acquires confidence in his instincts, and is reasonably well satisfied that he to be as correct as it has been in the farm, on shipboard and for travel to be guided very much more by tive system, such as Cholera, Cholera them than by his opinions. A consequence of which often is that his ready for use, and perfectly safe. habite gain in strength until theyget undesirably powerful, and his opinions grow vague for lack of practidemonstration. The more fixed his moral habits become, the more instinctive grows his behavior, and the less occasion he has to reason as to what is right or

We here follow De Graffenried himself who said, when released by the Indians at the time and place of the massacre of Lawson. "I ar rived at Newbern',—However, in a paragraph immediately preceding the above sentence he states "I have at last escaped from the cruel hands of this barbarous nation, the lascaroras, by the providence miraculeus of the Almighty and have arrived at my small house in New-Bern but half dead. Having been disturbed throughout the night before" he continues, "by the growling of bears quite near me expecting by them to be torn to pieces. having no arms, not even a pocket knife.

De Graffenried no where in any of his writing ever added the final to Newbern.

Hawks states in his history, "In December 1710 these Germans and Swiss landed at the confluence of Neuse and Trent rivers, and the town of New Berne was begun." This historian had visited Bern German), or Berne (French), even previous to the date of his history. But he was not aware of the existence of the manuscript of De Graffenried, therefore we now know more of the Baron's history and the settlement of Newbern than he

Dr. Hawks, however, throughout the history except in this one instance keeps strictly to the act of incorporation and amendments thereto, and writes it Newbern. Probably the matter will be carried to the next Legislature, as seemingly a majority of the citizens of the town prefer now New Borne.
