He was educated at the Virginia Military Inwas educated at the Virginia Military In-stitute and Harvard University, and proves his home, the creditor can take became a civil engineer. His first service was in the construction of the Lebanon Valley Railroad in Pennsylvania. He served for a time in the machine shops so as to become familiar with all the branches of railroad work. His knowledge of all the details of the railroad business was exceptional.

At the age of 25 he was appointed superintendent of the Senboard and Roanoke railroad, and lived in Norfolk, which position he held at the breaking out of the war in 1861.

Under his direction was constructed railroad battery, which is believed to structed. It consisted of a naval, thirtytwo pounder, mounted on a platform car, protected by an iron cusing. After the evacuation of Norfolk he was appointed captain in the enginneer corps of the Confederate States army, and served on the staff of Gen. W. W. Loring during the campaign in Western Virginin, where he was entrusted by the General with difficult and dangerous duties, Later on he was placed in charge of the railroad transportation of the Confederate Blates, and was sent to England by the Government to procure the railroad sup-plies, which were so much needed in the South. He sailed from Wilmington on a blockade running steamer, and suc-
