BUCK KITCHEN.
 A contemporary, in reviewing the recently published card of Captain Kitchen says: "The philosophy of the Captain's move, we think is about this. He really and truly disagrees with the President. Ten years ago he also disagreed with the President, and, after he had been unsuccessful in obtaining a high office, he abused him. During this administration he sought office, and one was bestowed upon him which he did not care to keep; so he retired and again expressed his disagreement with the administration. Now he probably expects to obtain an office by giving prominence to his dissent."
 Whatever may be the "philosophy" of the situation, we regret that Captain Kitchen has severed his connection with the Democratic party—or seems to have severed it. We will miss him, and it may be that we will feel the keen edge of his steel.
 It has been said that he is not a wise counsellor, this may be admitted, but no man can say that he is not a brave soldier in the field. We had much rather have Buck Kitchen for us than against us, and, reckless as the assertion may seem, we expect to have him with us. His present alienation is regretted for many reasons, not the least of which is the present situation. The condition of affairs, as represented by Captain Kitchen, demands that every Democrat buckle on his sword and stand by the ark of the covenant. The idea of Buck Kitchen playing the part of a demoralized and panic-stricken soldier is so foreign to all our preconceived opinions that we are almost persuaded that he has been stunned by a bomb, and will recover consciousness in time to win his spurs on the field.
 His words show that he is no renegade from principle. He says: "If there was any ground upon which I could still hope for better times for the party I would gladly remain in its ranks." This brief sentence is very significant. It evinces no abandonment of principles, it simply shows discouragement. He feels no hostility to the party whose colors he so often carried to victory for he says, if I could still hope for better times I would gladly remain in its ranks. We believe that abundant grounds of hope will be furnished at no distant day. Therefore, we have concluded not to drop Buck Kitchen from the rolls, but will report him as "absent without leave. There is no telling what even a brave man will do when 'stunned by a bomb'"
 A fond father can't desert his child when it is in danger, neither can a patriot desert his colors when it seems that the battle is going against him. If affairs are as Captain Kitchen represents them, and he is the brave man he is represented to be, he will stand by his party and assist other true and good men to rescue it from its peril.
 We don't know how it is. We have not looked at the situation from Captain Kitchen's stand point, but if it is true that the ship of State is manned by a piratical crew, it is the duty of Democrats to throw the pirates overboard and save the ship.
 It would appear that Captain's

Kitchen's whole grievance is Mr. Cleveland's conduct of public affairs. Suppose everybody who disagrees with the President abandons the Democratic party and the body-guard of the Constitution surrenders, what becomes of the country? The Democratic party will desert to be destroyed when it cannot shake the grasp of the tyrant and serpent from its throat. That day has not come, and it will never come. The people may be trifled with for a time, but the foundations of our liberties are firm and sure.
 The Democracy is not going to be ousted. It is going to hold its vantage ground, and when the impending battle is over we expect to see Old Buck at the head of a gang of terrified Democrats, and hear him say "Dik n't we give 'em hell."
 But they say "the captain sought office and failed to get it. Well, really, that does not amount to much. A soldier must blush to sink under the anguish of one wound, when he surveys his body soamed all over with the scars of many."
 The idea of Cleveland's throwing Kitchen out of the Democratic party is ridiculous. Claim your prompt rights, Captain, at all hazards and to the last extremity. The Democratic party belongs to the people and no man can wrest it from them.
