I cannot recall the name of the place with sufficient certainty to give it here, but the story as told by Brown is fresh in mind. They had arrived at the one poor tavern hungry and penniless, but fairly respectable as to appearance. A brilliant it a occurred to one of them. Hrown modestly said his ''pard' a . the originator of it, but it was su belously like his own genius for practical joking. Brown sat apart from the little group in the barroom, apparently absorbed in thought. His comrade mingled with the people, and by a casual remark conveved the impression that the silent and thoughtful guest was "Fletcher Webster, son of the godlike Daniel Webster," returning from a political mission of some importance and not caring to have the fact generally known. The curiosity of the bystanders being aroused, the "fellow traveler of Fletcher Webster" was invited up to the bar and plied with drinks and questions, the result being attempts to make the sequaintance of the son of the "godlike." These advances were met with dignified courtesy and a respectful invitation to "take something" was the best the house afforded was set out, and some of the leading men of the village who were at the tavern sat down with the guests.
