The physician is becoming a scientist. He is no longer a dogmatist. The various schools of medicine are in the throes of their final struggle for existence.—R. L. Wilbur, M. D.

A man may be a theorist and yet blunder; the man that is not a theorist, and especially the man who prides himself on not being a theorist, is sure to blunder.—Fabian Franklin.

A man's philosophy is the most important thing about him. It determines everything he does. For it is the mold from which his thoughts take their shape; and thoughts are deeds in the gristle.—Bouck White.

Everyman never understands why every other man does the things which he himself would not think of doing.

Everyman, if he plays golf, billiards, pool or any other game, never goes so well, as he did the last time he played.

Everyman when he was a boy was a devil of a fellow. Neither himself nor any one else dreamed that he could ever turn out so well.

Everyman lets his wife have her own way until he is thoroughly aroused and then he tears things up—so Everyman says when he talks about it to every other man.—Life.
