RUSSIAN WRITER TELLS OF WAR

Noted Correspondent Talks of Operations in Poland

(By A. H. Fletcher, Central News Correspondent.)

Petrograd, Dec. 30. (Central News Correspondence)—Nemerovitch Dan-chantes, the famous Russian war correspondent, is the author of the following powerful description in the "Ruskeys Above" of the operation in Poland in the last days of November:

"A new retreat of the defeated German troops began under the cover of a violent artillery fire. Their outflanking movement had been frustrated.

"The Germans fortified their positions at the rear of Alexandroff and from Sgerjz to Stroboll, turning their long line into an uninterrupted screen, which could not be attacked from the front without enormous losses to our troops. Behind this were retreating the greatly diminished German troops from Piontek and Lenchitz, toward Kresnevitza. All their rear was under the deadly firing of our artillery, which did not lose touch with the enemy for a moment.

"The fate of the detachment occupying Sgerjz was quickly decided. Although firmly entrenched and surrounded by thick wire entanglements it could not hold out. For two days it was unceasingly attacked by our heavy batteries, now and then replying feebly.

"It is said that the Germans at this point had no ammunition left, and that it was only by drawing on the reserves that they were able to obtain supplies.

"From reports received from those who have succeeded in breaking through toward Sgerjz the losses of the German troops have been heavy and the positions at their rear are heaped with dead. Wounded men freeze slowly to death as they crawl back toward the town in their rear. The clothing of the Germans is insufficient to meet the rigors of winter and the men become numb in the snow filled trenches. On November 26th the frost registered four degrees below zero, Fahrenheit.

"The discontent of the Kaiser's troops is reflected in the demeanor of the German prisoners. The German officers who have been taken prisoners recognize already the futility of struggling against Russia.

"On the night of November 27th, the rear of our guns was incessant. In the dim light it seems as though the sky was being lashed with whips of steel. The momentary flashes on the low clouds showed the presence of the Russian batteries. It seemed in this titanic duel that everything animate or inanimate was trying to make itself as small as possible, and to press close to the earth's icy bosom. The villages had been abandoned and there was no sign of life.

"At one point a clever ruse was used by the Germans. They were veterans who had retreated from Breziny. Without moving from their cold trenches they suddenly started a cheer, as though they were advancing to attack. Our men, accustomed to meet such attentions with the bayonet, rushed forward. The manoeuvre succeeded twice, but on the third occasion we allowed a detachment of the guards which really came to meet us, to come close to our trenches before we opened fire and virtually destroyed them by rifle volleys.

"Only a few Germans returned to the silent trenches and later we could see companies of reserves coming up from the second line of trenches under our artillery fire.

"There is not a single calm moment at night. The Germans are nervous in the darkness and have a wholesome fear of a night attack. We, on the contrary, are well practiced in night assaults, the lessons of the Japanese war having been taken to heart.

"Generally speaking, although the Germans may have great advantage in the matter of organization for war we are equal to them in the matter of utilizing local conditions to the best advantage and leave them far behind in courage, enthusiasm and ready initiative."
