THE ELECTORAL COLLEGE.

Dangers and Effects of the System by Which Our Presidents Are Chosen.

"It's like the pitcher that goes safely to the well day after day, day after day, and then all of a sudden gets smashed. That's my opinion of the electoral college system by which we choose our Presidents."

So said a man who was talking with some of his friends in an up-town club. The question of the reliability of the present method of electing the President had been raised by a young man who had asked for information.

"What's to prevent a presidential elector from voting another ticket than the one that it was understood that he would vote when he was placed in nomination by his party?" the young man had inquired.

To this question one of the party had replied: "If you mean to ask me if there is any law to prevent such a performance, I can promptly answer in the negative. There's no provision of law relating to the electors, either constitutional or statutory, which takes cognizance of a party's right to instruct a presidential elector how he shall vote. If you'll take this book—its the Constitution of the United States—and read, beginning right here, you'll see what the law is.

The young man had taken the book and read as follows:

"Each State shall appoint in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in Congress; but no Senator or Representative or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed elector.

"The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice President, one of whom at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President and of all persons voted for as Vice President, and of all persons voted for as President and of the number of votes for each—"

"There—that's all there is of the law," the person who had undertaken to answer the young man's question had said, breaking off the reading in the middle of the sentence. "The plain English of the matter is that a man who is chosen a presidential elector is bound by no law except the law of honor. Here's New York with thirty-six electors. When the time comes for the State's vote to be cast, each one of the thirty-six electors who shall have been chosen at the State election may, if he likes, vote for his own grandfather provided the old man is eligible, and there is no law under which he could be arraigned for the betrayal of a trust imposed upon him by his party."

"And this thing has been going on ever since the foundation of the government?"

"Yes, sir."

"And has there never been an instance of betrayal of his party by an elector?"

"Never to my knowledge, and I don't believe there ever will be."

At this point an old gentleman who had been taking no part in the conversation asked to be allowed to say a few words.

"You gentlemen seem to take it for granted," said he, "that every man who has been chosen a presidential elector has done precisely what he has been commissioned to do by the people who have elected him. You are wrong in this. If you will take the trouble to run back to the story of the election of 1824, you will find that there were four candidates for whom electoral votes were cast: John Quincy Adams, William H. Crawford, Andrew Jackson and Henry Clay, New York was entitled to 36 electoral votes, and the electors were chosen by the Legislature after a struggle of five days.

"Adams got 25 of the electors, Clay got 7, and Crawford got 4. Now had the votes of these electors been cast according to the understanding prevailing when the electors were chosen, the vote of the electoral college would have been: Jackson, 92; Adams, 83; Crawford, 40; Clay, 40. As it was, 3 of the Clay electors deserted him and went to Adams, Jackson and Crawford, and by that act made Clay the fourth man in the vote of the electoral college, and ineligible as a candidate before the House, which had to do the electing, no candidate having received a majority of the electoral vote.

"Some people say that if these three New Yorkers had not deserted Clay his name would have surely gone to the house instead of Crawford's and they profess to believe that, had it gone to the House, John Quincy Adams would not have been elected President.

"But, however, that may be, one thing is clear; it is that three men voted contrary to the expectation of those who elected them. Why, one of them, as I said, gave Jackson a vote, who was not even a candidate before the Legislature of New York when the electors were chosen.

"For another instance, I'll point you to the election of 1800, when one of the Maryland electors did not vote. There's no knowing how he would have voted had he taken part in the election, but he might have voted in such a way as to have obviated one of the most notable political contests ever known in this country, the contest went into the House, the Federalists undertook to make Burr President, and thirty-six ballots were taken before Jefferson, who was the people's choice for President, secured the election. Now, suppose that Maryland man had voted for Jefferson for President, don't you see the excitement of that long contest would have been avoided?"

"Eight years later a Kentucky elector failed to vote, but his not voting was inconsequential. That was the year that Madison was elected the first time by an overwhelming majority in the electoral college.

"Come down to the time of Monroe's election and you'll find that three electors died before the time for voting came, but here again the loss of three votes in the electoral college was a matter of small amount, for Monroe had all the votes cast except one, which was cast by a New Hampshire man who deemed it due to the memory of Washington that no President after him should share the honor of a unanimous election. In 1864, I believe, Nevada lost one of her votes in the electoral college by the death of an elector. That was the year that Lincoln got 212 votes to McClellan's 21.

"I dare say other instances could be cited of the failures of electors to do what they were chosen to do, but these that I have already given are enough, it seems to me, to sustain the contention of my friend here that our way of choosing the President is a poor one. It's objectionable because there is danger that electors may betray their trusts; again, that by act of God they may be prevented from doing their duty; that partisans in the body which makes the count may take advantage of the blunders. There is no excuse for such a system in these days. We ought to get rid of it."—New York Times.

One courageous Clevelander has sent in his name to Mayor Mendenhall. If the Mayor means business he will have his hands full; that's all.

One of our printers has been sick for two days, and we have gotten behind in reading matter. But we will get it there yet, if you will just give us time.

Some of the negroes are regretting that they sold out so cheap. Why, "some got only fifty cents" we heard some of them say as we passed the courthouse this morning.

We publish an article from the New York Times on the electoral college, and its dangers. It takes a good deal of our space, but it is a valuable article and so we give it.

We hear that Mayor Mendenhall is inquiring after the names of the leaders in last night's jollification. That is carrying the thing a little too far. Let the boys alone, Mr Mayor; they have done no harm.

Good Looks

Good looks are more than skin deep, depending upon a healthy condition of all of the vital organs. If the liver be inactive, you have a bilious look. If your stomach be disordered you have a dyspeptic look, and if your kidneys be affected you have a pinched look. Secure good health and you will have good looks. Electric Bitters is a great alternative and tonic acts directly on the vital organs. Cures pimples, blotches, boils and gives a good complexion. Sold at C. E. Holton's drug store 50 cent per bottle.

Pronounced Hopeless Yet Cured.

From a letter written by Mrs. Ada E. Hurd, of Groton, S. D., we quote the following: "Was taken with a severe cold which settled on my lungs, cough set in and finally resulted in consumption. Four Doctors gave me up, saying I could live but a short time. I gave myself up to my Saviour, determined that if I could not stay with my friends on earth, I would meet my absent ones above. My husband was advised to get Dr. King's New Discovery for consumption, coughs, and colds. I gave it a trial and took in a little while; it has cured me, and thank God I am a well and hearty woman. Trial bottles free at C. E. Holton's drug store regular size 50 cents and $1.
