DINNER COMING UP—The regal turkey is a traditional symbol of the American Thanksgiving season. Here several pause to spread their feathers and gaze with obvious curiosity at the cameraman.

He gets the poults when they are a day old. To keep his flock docke, he separates tiens and toms throughout their stay at the farm.

To prevent disease-causing injury from fighting, Mayo "de-snoods" the birds. The snood is the fleshey protrusion over the beak of the turkey. It is pinched off early in the turkey's life.

Mayo houses his turkeys eight weeks and then turns them on the range. He rotates the range every four years to cut down the possi bility of disease carryover.

The plump bird delivered to the Tanksgiving table would suggest that the turkey is a hearty eater. Mayo agrees! His birds consume four tons of feed daily.

To satisfy this appetite, he has erected his own feed mix mill and reports that it has saved him about $5,000 in the three years of operation. He 'plans .add tional storage to keep his own grain on the farm and increase profits further.

Toms gain about a pound a week; hens two-thirds of a pound when fed the high protein diet. Hens are sold at 20 weeks at weign.s averaging 13 pounds and toms at 25 to 26 weeks weighing about 25 pounds. Mayo sells his turkeys independently to three processing plants
