God Comes To Us
Lesson for December 23, 1962

THE truth about Christmas is not to be seen on the Christmas tree, not in the bargain-basement Santa Claus, not in the holly and the ivy, and not in every Christmas card. Yet some of the carols tell the story truly: "Immanuel has come to thee . . ." or "Thou didst leave thy throne . . ." or "Word of the Father Now in flesh appearing"; and others telling the same story.

Dr. Foreman The deep truth about Christmas is that the day celebrates the coming of God to us. The very name Immanuel means "God with us." Now it would not all be true to say that God had never come to this world before; he was here in history, in the beauty and the order of all this vast universe. The prophets, one and all, knew him, and the poets sang of him. But what was new about the first Christmas (and what it began) was that now men could not only know that God is, we know what God is like.

God is Expression
Jesus Christ is the translation of God into the language of human living. He is the Eternal in the pattern of time. There are philosophers who do not see how the High God can possibly express himself; but the Bible tells us of a God who is not content with expressing himself, he desires to communicate with his children. In John I Christ is called the Word. He lived to be, he lived to tell. He is God's messenger but also he is God's message. The Word—the Expression, the Message, the Communication—of God "became flesh" on that first Christmas. Anyone might have thought that if God came to the world he had made, to the people he had made, in a new way, they might have thought it would leave us with a discouraging question. How can we be the light of the world? Again John points to the answer. To those who receive the Light, God gives "power to become children of God." By ourselves, we cast a pretty feeble light. By ourselves, we are weak. God's "coming" is not like the coming of man. People come and go away, and we are not greatly changed. But when God comes, and we open our lives to him, we begin to be changed from the very core of our lives. As we share in the vision of God, so we share in the power of the God who comes to us in Jesus.
