Review 1963 Farm Bureau Policy Book

To Find Positions Taken By Organization

By Verne Strickland, N. C. Farm Bureau

If you thumb through the 1963 policy booklet of the American Farm Bureau, you'll probably expect to find positions taken by the organization on the tobacco, peanut and cotton programs. And you'll find them.

You'll also see policies on a dual grading system for beef, on the Packers and Stockyards Act, and on fish flour. This is to be expected.

These subjects relate directly to agriculture. The resolutions describe how farmers feel about issues which have a bearing on their economic security.

But, if you're not too familiar with Farm Bureau, you might discover within the 62 pages of policies some statements on subjects seemingly unrelated to agriculture. They are entirely unrelated.

Let's dissect page 46. The policy well, although the farm population is on the decline numerically, we still live in an essentially agricultural State. And, if you are aware of the fact that they are just like anybody else.

They are not only interested in their business - how much peanuts are selling for, or whether MH-30 will be outlawed - they are vitally interested also in protecting their rights, in the welfare of their families and their country, in what they see on television. You can see these interests reflected in the policies of Farm Bureau.
