Livestock, Poultry Expansion Slowed By Feed Grain Program

The feed grain program has thrown a multi-million dollar roadblock into the path of expansion of North Carolina's livestock and poultry industries.

The program is cutting production of home-grown grain and increasing the need for imported grain that carries with it the extra cost of transportation from the Midwest.

"The feed grain program costs North Carolina livestock and poultry producers about $5 million more than before to keep production at the same levels," observes Everett Nichols, extension grain marketing specialist at North Carolina State College.

This additional cost is the transportation charge on corn shipped in from the Midwest. This cost increased from $5.1 million in 1960-61 to $10.1 million in 1961-62.

In brief, the livestock and poultry producers in a surplus grain state can equal the production of counterparts in North Carolina but with $5 million less feed expense.

"This increase in cost of shipping corn can be attributed largely to the feed grain program," said Nichols. "This cost is expected to be above $10 million again in 1962-63."

North Carolina, historically, has been a deficit grain producing state, depending on imported feed grains to support livestock production.

"Whenever local production is reduced (as it is under the feed grain program), North Carolina livestock and poultry producers become more dependent on midwestern grain," Nichols pointed out.

The cost of this grain to the Tar Heel is the same as to the midwestern livestock man, plus the shipping costs - thus the disadvantage of the North Carolina producer in competing with the midwesterner or with others in states where grain is available locally.

"Unless some adjustments are made to offset the relative feed cost disadvantage, this will tend to slow the rate of expansion of livestock and poultry production in North Carolina," Nichols concluded.

One-sixth of the nation's food energy and 75 per cent of its calcium requirements come from dairy foods.
