Welfare Commissioner Praises Work Of Study Commission

R. Eugene Brown, Acting North Carolina Commissioner of Public Welfare, today commented favorably on the report of the Commission to Study Public Welfare Programs appointed by Governor Sanford in compliance with a resolution of the 1951 General Assembly.

"The Study Commission made a detailed and exhaustive study of all public welfare programs being administered by the State and county departments of public welfare," said Brown. "I think the members of the Commission have done an excellent job and believe that many of their recommendations will be helpful to the public welfare program."

The report, recently published, states that North Carolina has "basically, a sound and progressive public welfare program... recognized nationally for its emphasis on preventive, protective and rehabilitative services and for its pioneering work in various constructive programs." The Commission's recommendations were made "with the hope that they will serve to help make a good program even better."

Among the recommendations are emphasis on securing and retaining well-trained staff to strengthen public welfare administration.

The report also states that its questionnaires indicated that North Carolina's State-supervised, locally administered program is almost unanimously favored among county commissioners, county welfare boards, and county directors of public welfare. The desirable effects of local administration include more local interest in the program; more support for the program; better interpretation of the program to the taxpayers, keeping the program sensitive to varying local conditions; and making a more personal type of service available to the people.

financial services in this State, and many more people receive social services which involve no money payments at all than receive financial assistance," said Mr. Brown.

"Public social services are sought by and made available to persons from all social and economic groups in North Carolina. This is as it should be because constructive social services help to conserve and strengthen our human resources."
