Tobacco Farms Improved By Program

The day when the tobacco farmer will no longer have to resort to hoeing as a means of weed control is rapidly approaching, hurried along by the findings of agricultural research.

Many farmers already have put away the hoe and, as a result of their use of chemical weed control measures, have the cleanest fields of their farming careers.

This major advance in tobacco production has been made possible in part by the farmers themselves who support research and education through their contributions to the Nickels for Know-How program.

Research work conducted between 1949 and 1959 indicated considerable promise for combined use of herbicides and tillage for the control of weeds in tobacco.

The increased efforts have been most productive. Technical know-how is now available for controlling weeds and eliminating use of the hoe. It will also reduce by half the number of cultivations needed.

North Carolina's many tobacco growers have benefited in this and many other areas as a result of research and educational work carried out with the money they and other farmers contributed through Nickels for Know-How.

They will vote again Nov. 19, on whether they want to continue supporting research and education through the self-assessment of a nickel a ton for feed and fertilizer purchased.
