should we let the town burn?

In 1776, a community crisis was just that: a community crisis. If a house caught fire, people either put it out themselves or the town burned down. Big problems were the responsibility of each individual within the community. From fire-fighting to corn-husking, the daily history of our ancestors was one of democratic co-operation. No one considers this an un-American activity; in fact, most folks look upon it as an American heritage.

When the farmers of North Carolina tried to get electricity some time ago, they found they would have to do the job as a community — and they did it. Today, however, there are those who attack the rural electric co-operatives with the assertion that what they did is somehow wrong.

One charge is that co-ops are owned by Washington. As our fore-fathers might have said, "It just ain't so." Co-ops are not government-owned. They are not government-controlled. Electric co-ops are owned, governed, and paid for by their own members — ordinary people who work together to meet a common need, just as Americans have worked together for over 200 years.
