The Life Of John Sevier

WRITTEN by Jerry Andrews, Route 2, Rose Hill, N.C., a 7th Grade Student in Mr. William R. Teachey's Room of Rose Hill Elementary School.

John Sevier was born to Valentine and Joana Goode Sevier on September twenty-third, 1745, on a little farm in the Shenandoah Valley of Virginia.

As a boy John helped his father farm and trade with the Indians. He also helped his father run a small tavern.

Sevier received very little education. He was enrolled in the Fredericksburg Academy and the Staunton School. Both were in Virginia.

Sevier left school at the age of sixteen to marry Sarah Hawkins. Twenty-nine years later his wife died.

In 1790, about seven months after the death of his first wife he married Catherine Sherrill, who was called the 'Bonney Kate' in the song of the Tennessee Frontier.

In 1771 James Robertson from Wake County led a group of settlers over the Smokey Mountains to the Watauga River Valley. Later over pioneers joined them. Sevier was one of these who later became a famous leader and Indian fighter.

In 1772 Watauga men drew up a document something like the Declaration of Independence. This document stated that they were to have an executive council, a legislature department, a sheriff, and an attorney. In the year 1776 the men that had started the association, known as the Washington District, sent representatives to the North Carolina Assembly to discuss the matter of becoming part of North Carolina or Tennessee.

Sevier liked to move around. This gave him the name of Nollchucky Jack.

In December 1773 he became a pioneer and moved with his family to the Holston River Valley, from which he later helped to start the short-lived state of Franklin.

At the beginning of the Revolution the Indians attacked the little fort of Watauga Valley but with Sevier and Robertson as leaders, Watauga Valley was saved.

Sevier supported the Revolutionary cause, however he took little part in the fighting until 1780. In this year, with Colonel Isaac Shelby as a scout, he led to Watauga Valley men on an expedition over the 'Smokies' to find Ferguson and his men. On this expedition Colonel William Campbell joined Sevier to increase his might. Colonel Benjamin Cleveland, along with other local leaders, also helped his small army.

After days of wandering, Sevier located Ferguson on Kings

Mountain. Around nine hundred of the best mounted men were sent ahead with Sevier in command. While the others waited on all sides of the mountain in case Ferguson tried to escape, the nine hundred swarmed up the side of the hill, firing as they went. When they reached the top Ferguson was shot down, and his men surrendered to Sevier and Campbell, and were taken prisoners.

After the Revolutionary War was over the people of the future state of Tennessee wanted to make the region a separate state. The State of Franklin was organized in 1784, and Sevier was elected first governor. Quarrels over land, and with the Indians led to the downfall of the state of Franklin in 1788. With Franklin no longer a state, Sevier was without work, his career was blasted, and he became an outlaw. Not long after, however, a friend of Sevier pleaded with the governor of North Carolina, explaining Sevier's problems, and he was pardoned.

After he was pardoned by the governor he was elected to the North Carolina Senate. Later, in 1789, he was elected to the Federal Congress, where he served for two years.

When the lost state of Franklin joined the new state of Tennessee, John Sevier was elected governor. He served six terms as governor of Tennessee.

Sevier quarrelled with Andrew Jackson in 1798 over a land speculation Sevier had made. Even though Jackson charged Sevier with land frauds, the career of the Kings Mountain hero, with his thirty five battles and thirty-three victories, was not harmed. Sevier was re-elected for the State Senate for one term.

John Sevier also served one term in the Federal Congress. He died near Fort Decatur, Georgia, on September 24, 1815 one day past his seventieth birthday.
