Fable No. 2: "Private power monopolies are guarding your freedom"

Watching westerns is a favorite American pastime. You know the rules: good guys wear white hats; bad guys wear black hats.

The latest attack on rural electric cooperatives by private power monopolies runs something like a western: Private power companies are protecting your freedom. They're just like cowboys, country doctors and other American-hero types. They wear white hats.

Who's wearing the black hats? To hear the power companies tell it, it's the electric co-ops.

It all started back in the '30s when a lot of our country doctors, cowhands and farmers wanted to get electricity. When private power monopolies refused, these rugged folks did the job themselves through electric co-ops. After some lean years, these local, nonprofit organizations got out of the red.

That's when the private power monopolies buckled on their gunbelts. Now they want to stampede the co-ops out of business and have the whole-range to themselves.
