Early Warnings From Spring Boating

By John Parker N. C. Outdoor Safety Supervisor
Twenty North Carolinians have drowned so far this year while seeking recreation through boating. According to Wildlife Commission reports, all of these fatalities occurred during March and April when spring weather was still a bit undecided.
One of the primary reasons for this loss of life was that one or more of the occupants stood up or drastically shifted his weight while fishing from a small boat. In doing this, the victims either fell from or upset the craft. That old saying, "don't rock the boat" is often used to steady situations remote from boating. But if early warnings are of any value, we would do well to apply this cliché in its fullest nautical sense.
With the water temperature in the mid-forties during much of this period, it is reasonable to assume that exposure and sudden chilling contributed to the high death rate. Since temperature is an important factor in water deaths we can assume that at least a few of the victims would have survived had the accidents occurred in June or July. Further, since some of the victims were elderly persons it is possible that a heart attack or other physical defect was the direct cause of the boater going overboard in the first place.
Intoxication was a contributing factor in two or three cases.
The simple act of falling from a boat caused half of the above mentioned fatalities. There was no crash in the fog, no fire or violent action, just tumbling overboard.
Is there something to be learned from these accidents? Should we vow to never again stand in a boat? This is not necessary but it will depend on the boater and the boat. If a boat is somewhat tipsy or unstable when you are sitting in it, then surely it will be more so when you stand.

And there are times when we should be safer glued to the seat, even in large runabouts. Since several of these occurred on private spring boating accidents ponds, perhaps a word on the stability of these small pond type boats would be of value. Many boating enthusiasts could at a glance determine just how much of a load or how much water one of these small boats could withstand. If you have such a boat and do not feel that you know your craft, here is something you may wish to try.
Pick a warm day, a couple of qualified helpers, and take your boat to the shallows and give it a thorough testing. Those involved in the test should be wearing life preservers.
There is a boating rule often seen on safety placards and in brochures and it says simply, know your boat. That is the purpose of this test. You might try sitting on the gunwale, standing in the boat, rocking it and perhaps have one or two of those qualified helpers climb in and check the loading capacity of your craft. Chances are you will find that this type of boat is generally not stable and has little freeboard when occupied.
Is there something to be learned from the five Easter Monday drownings that were a direct result of high wind? We would hope so, and without exploiting the deaths of our fellow boaters there should be mentioned another rule of boating and that is - respect the weather. This means, in lay terms, to know when to come in or better still, when to stay in.
Worthy of mention is the fact that quite a few other boaters ran into trouble during the March 30th blow. They will, no doubt, remember the weather rule.

Recent reports forwarded to the Wildlife Commission also reveal that a few boaters have been injured as a result of some unusual boating accidents.
One boater was cut by the propeller of his own boat when he was thrown from it by the wave of another boat. Boating laws remind us that we are responsible for our wake.
A ski boat driver, misjudged at drop-off time, hit a barge and sank his boat. The accident report stated that this was the driver's first time at the helm of this particular boat. Know your boat.
A young man drowned while swimming from a boat in early April. Had the victim been warned about swimming in cold water perhaps he would be with us today.
Underwater objects pose a problem for the careful boater as well as the careless boater. One boater, at no fault of his own, impaled his boat on such an object and the occupants of the sinking boat had to be rescued.
The most unusual accident to date happened when a boat with two occupants was driven under the tow table of a ferry boat. The windshield of the boat was damaged and as you might expect so was the upper anatomy of the boaters. The lesson here: stay alert and operate your craft at a speed suited to quick and accurate handling when approaching unusual conditions or other craft.
Our old acquaintance, the overpowered boat, arrived on the scene and was the apparent cause for a double drowning. From this we are reminded that the high-powered motor is a boon to boater, but like the weather it must be respected.
Many boats have yet to slip from their trailers this season but already the above reports are filed. This year's beginning is not good and in order that we might maintain or improve upon last season's downward trend in boating accidents, we must slow the present accident rate.
