Mental Admissions Increase

Admissions to North Carolina's mental hospitals are increasing at the rate of 1,000 per year, according to a report issued today by Dr. Myron G. Sandifer, Director of Research for the State Department of Mental Health.

Admissions during the fiscal year 1963-64 just completed, totaled 11,900 as compared with 10,826 admissions during the previous year.

The yearly increase of roughly 1,000 admissions has continued relatively unchanged since 1957, when total admissions amounted to 4,000.

Approximately 55% of admissions to the state psychiatric hospitals are entering for the first time, Sandifer explained.

But 45% are readmissions, that is, they have been treated in the state hospitals at least once before. He described the first 60 days after discharge as the "critical period" in the patients' readjustment to home and community.

"It is the period during which patients are most likely to return to the hospital."

In interpreting the figures, Dr. Sandifer pointed out that in spite of steadily climbing admission rates, discharges from the hospitals have kept pace with admissions. This means, he said, that the state hospitals are treating and discharging many times the number of patients today than they were a few years ago.

At the same time, he cautioned that the problem of ever increasing admissions is one that the state psychiatric institutions are likely to face for many years to come.
