SPORTS AFIELD

By Ted Kesting

There are many ways to pack and carry a load. One of the oldest, simplest and best rigs is the Alaska bush packboard. It is widely available from just about any good outfitter purveying sportsmen's gear and ranges in cost from about $14 to $18. But "Once you've had a look at one and made a couple of rough sketches, the packboard is easy to construct at home," says John Jobson, Camping Editor of Sports Afield Magazine. Physically, the Alaska packboard consists of a rectangular wood frame (four or five pieces of wood in all—two uprights always and two, sometimes three, crosspieces) around which is tightly laced a cover of 12-ounce canvas. Two shoulder straps (adjustable) of either leather or webbing are affixed—and you're in business. The canvas runs around the frame, creating a space between your back and the load. This is a crowning virtue. It keeps our poor backs from contacting the bumps and irregularities of the sometimes chafing load, and it keeps our backs cool, for there is a circulation of air between the load and ourselves. With a packboard you can transport such items as large outboard motors; chain saws; moose antlers; caribou heads; grizzly hides; game meat; small, light plants; odd-shaped containers of grub. In other words, the packboard lends itself to professional backpacking as well as casual or dilettante jobs. It is magnificently versatile. In use, the object or load is simply lashed to the frame (eyes or hooks being there for the purpose). An example: For a backpack trip, you roll all your gear into a canvas shelter, lash it to the board and take off. In the case of the commercial models, you can purchase the 'board with a companion canvas bag that is instantly put on or taken off by means of a couple of light steel rods securing the grommets in the canvas to the eyes on the packboard. Thus you have, in effect, a light framed rucksack—but one that can quickly be adapted for heavy, bulky loads.
