Written Agreement Needed Between Tobacco Partners

The acreage-poundage tobacco program has solved some of the problems caused by surplus production, but it is creating problems for many fluecured growers.

cured growers.

The 10 per cent carry-over provision of the acreage-poundage program tends to com-plicate annual rental arrange-ments, according to Jim All-good and Clyde Weathers, ex-tension farm management economists at North Carolina State University.

The economists point out that the tobacco program has in-creased the importance of hav-ing a leasing agreement in writing. The agreement should state the maximum number of pounds that may be sold as well as the maximum number of acres that may be planted.

In several cases, they said tobacco has been cash remed on a per-acre basis without any agreement on the number of pounds that could be sold, "If it isn't written down, this type of agreement often leads to some misunderstandings."

The farm economists explain that the tenant who cash rents tobacco on an annual and per acre basis will probably want to sell as many pounds as possible. On the other hand, the land owner who leases tobacco by the acre would not want the tenant to sell the maximum tenant to sell the maximum poundage allotment in one year. This may be particularly true, they said, unless the tenant agrees to pay the land owner for the right to sell the extra

One of the best ways to prevent misunderstandings and be fair to both parties is to cash rent on a per-pound-of-tobacco sold basis. This type of lease would state that tobacco would be grown within the provisions of the acreage-poundage pro-gram, and the landowner would receive a certain amount per
