Voltage Common Sense

Large electric lines are necessary to ensure a constant supply of power. For safety's sake, every precaution is taken in designing, locating and building electrical distribution lines. Still it is important for one to be careful when working near them.

Below are some basic safety rules that need to be followed around electric lines.

1. Never climb poles or towers - it could be your last climb.
2. Don't tamper with wires or equipment - you might suddenly become a conductor.
3. Don't throw rocks or shoot at electrical equipment. Vandalism costs you and your family money in the form of increased rates.
4. Don't fly kites or string controlled model airplanes near power lines.
5. Be careful when working on roofs or erecting antennas. Stay clear of lines.
6. If you see a wire down, do not touch or go near it. Assume that it is alive. Call the electric company and the police.
7. If someone has been shocked unconscious by contacting a downed wire, don't try to pull him away - you'll get shocked too. Use a dry board or wooden pole to pry or shove him away from the wire.

8. If an electric wire should fall on your car while you are in it, don't try to get out. Wait for help. Your rubber tires are good insulation. If you must get out, jump clear. If you see someone in such a predicament, don't try to help. Instead call the police.

9. If you work around a farm and use equipment where booms or equipment could touch electric lines, be extra careful.

10. In case of fire involving electric lines, don't spray water from a hose. A stream of water is an effective conductor of electricity. Call the fire department or use the type of extinguisher recommended for electrical fires.
