ON THE MOSSY BANKS AT TWILIGHT

By Floyd Salmon

Between the fall and winter, when things are turning brown,

I like to go out in autumn and enjoy looking around.

Once I wandered down the river to the old gray moss-bed. I thought I would rest a while, but many tears I shed.

I thought of good old days gone by forevermore:

Of the days I had spent at twilight upon this mossy shore. Of all the birds that used to sing, and make things very bright,

Of how we sat through twilight and on into the night.

I thought of how she would whisper things I loved to hear,

Of many, many sweet songs she sang, of places far and near.

Of how the nightingale throbbled melodies so sweet, and rich and clear,

To tell the change in weather in the falling of the year. These thoughts I had as I sat there, on this crisp autumn eve,

I thought that I belonged there and I must never leave. But now she is gone forever, her eyes no longer shine Upon my brow that used to be, to her so very sublime. I think now as I wander back, with tear-drops in my eyes, If I will meet her some bright day, far up in the Heavenly skies.
