THE LIFE OF DICKENS

By Edna Earl Huffman,
7th Grade

Charles Dickens was a small hungry looking boy. He had very poor clothing and he wore a very unhappy face. Although Charles worked day by day at night, he would go to his bare room and think about his unhappy life. It was a wonder that the little Charles didn't die, with such a weak body.

But this little boy lived, became in a few years a short hand reporter, with a very good salary, and at twenty-five, he was the famous author of "Pickwick".

John Dickens, the father of Charles, was a very poor clerk, stationed at Portsmouth at the time of Charles' birth. There was an elder sister, Fanny, born in 1813. Charles, the second child, was born February 7, 1812. There were four boys and two girls born later, two of whom died in childhood. And only one, the oldest sister, survived the famous brother, Charles.

The fancies of little Charles' childhood were far more different than the other boys. He sometimes watched the other boys play while he read a book. His father had a little room upstairs where he kept books. Often Charles would spend hours in this room reading books. Soon he began putting some of his stories together, and told them to his friends. People often took him to the theatre and soon he and his cousin James Lambert had fitted up a room where they presented plays of their own. When Charles was a little older than nine, his father was assigned to duty at London. Now Charles had to leave the happiest scenes of his childhood. He was not to go to school any longer and his home was a very unhappy place.

After the Dickens family moved they got deep in debt and had to give up all their property. Although the father was a good honest man, he was proud of Charles, but he was so worried that he didn't try to educate him. Affairs determined that she would try to support the family by starting a school, but the school was no help at all, for nobody came to it. The father was arrested for his debts. While Mr. Dickens was in prison Charles ran errands for him. At last James Lambert found a position for Charles. Mrs. Dickens and the children went to live with Mr. Dickens at the prison. James Lambert carried Charles to the place he was to work. It was an old tumble-down house, overrun by rats. The room was on the first floor overlooking the coal barges and the river. His work was to cover the pots with paste blacking, first with a piece of oil paper, and then with a piece of blue paper, then tie them with a string and clip the paper close and neat so it would look as if it came from an apothecary's shop.

While Charles was at this work he boarded with Mrs. Pipechin. His breakfast was a penny loaf and a penny's worth of milk. At supper he had a quarter of a pound of cheese. Charles earned very little and all that went to Mrs. Pipechin for his board. At last Mr. Dickens got out of jail. Then the family lived under the same roof. The father found a way to send Charles to school a short while and Charles made good use of it. Charles then was given a place as clerk in a lawyer's office. There he learned the advantage of shorthand writing. Then his story writing began. His best was "Pickwick".

It was published in parts, and Charles was paid seventy-five dollars for each part. It didn't sell well at first, but it soon increased and forty thousand copies were sold monthly. Charles was beloved by everyone. People liked and read his stories but "Pickwick" was the best seller. In January, 1842 at the age of 30, Charles enthusiasm. In a short while he went back to England and published a paper about the American Notes. Soon he published another paper by the name of "A Tale of Two Cities". This story led midway between the story of "Pickwick" and Charles visited America again in 1867. On June 9, 1870 Charles died from an effusion of the brain, as the result of the breaking up of the nervous system and what appeared to be incipient paralysis. The famous Charles Dickens lies buried in Westminster Abby.
