Looking at Washington

Last week the Administration Tax Bill ran into difficulties before the Senate Finance Committee, which was reported hopelessly divided and considering far-reaching modification of the measure. Sentiment developed in favor of a broadening of the income tax base and decreased levies. Another obstacle was the fear of some Senators that the bill would stabilize corporate organizations where they now stand. Ending a public hearing, the Committee pondered over the virtually unanimous opposition expressed by tax experts and business men, many of whom voiced the belief that the measure would prevent small business from growing into big businesses through the use of distributed profits.

Some sought substitute plans and Senator Couzens, Independent Republican who originally favored the measure, publicly withdrew his support. During the hearing the bill was pronounced uncertain, complex, and hazardous to business; the Treasury's estimates were disputed, and George O. May, internationally known accountant and a special advisor to the Treasury during the War, insisted that the taxes were not needed and that with continued improvement in business the present rates would bring in revenue sufficient to meet the needs of the Government.
