

From "Beanery" To The "White House"

By HERBERT L. KNIGHT
On May 13th, 1927, Mr. and Mrs. John Sheffield launched their restaurant service venture in Wallace. Their first business home was a lunch wagon, built of boards, tin and, in fact any piece of material that John could find to protect his business and customers from the weather. But quality and service always find a way, and the business thrived.

The scene changes to 1937. The "match box" lunch wagon stands today in John Sheffield's back lot, a relic of by-gone days, symbolic of the struggle, of hard work and honest cooperation to grow through a service well-rendered. In its stead, on the site where it formerly stood, is the new, beautiful, modern and popular White House Cafe.

That, in brief, is the chronology of Wallace's White House Cafe, and if caterers enter the Pearly Gates and have to submit a biographical sketch of their records here on earth, then we venture the assertion that the script of John and Naomi will carry the title line: "From Lunch Wagon to the White House in one short decade."

which Wallace is a part, an excellent means of cheap transportation.

Several regular freight and barge lines operate regular schedules between various points, and their facilities have been greatly expanded during the past three years. A line operating out of Wilmington, Wallace's closest neighboring city, was a pioneer in such transportation, and their vessels ply between Carolina, Virginia, and Maryland points. Adequate dockage exists at many ports touching on the waterway, so that almost any kind of freight may be handled.

Since the opening of the so-called "barrier" section through the North Carolina marshes in 1933, freight of many different kinds have been hauled through the waterway, this consisting of bulky materials, such as, fertilizer, coal, sugar, feedstuffs, lumber, poles, etc. Recently there has come into being quite a traffic in petroleum products, many tankers making regular runs along the coast via the inside course.

The entire canal has a length of approximately 2,000 miles, and although the Dismal Swamp link was started back in Colonial days, the various private corporations which at one time or another completed other sections, were never able to coordinate their efforts to the extent of converting the waterway into a through canal.

These conditions existed when the federal government took over the job several years ago, and under the guidance of the engineer

The main part of the waterway through the North Carolina coast country has a depth at mean low water of 12 feet, while the bottom width is 90 feet. The top width is 150 feet, but this is augmented in many places by the natural depth of the water.

Once criticized as a useless expenditure of government funds, the inland waterway has proved to be of inestimable value to operators of coastwise shipping vessels on the Atlantic coast, as it affords a protected, sheltered water route from New York to Miami. Yachtsmen also find it a boon to their annual fall and spring treks to the resort sections of the southeast. Once but a deserted stretch of marshland, inhabited by waterfowl and an occasional oyster tonger or fisherman, the region through which the canal passes is now teeming with craft, large and small, with their numbers increasing each year.

Shippers throughout Eastern Carolina were once lukewarm, or frankly outspoken against the canal not so long ago, but now they know it to be the means
