Expect Swine Prices To Top 1936 Season

Hog prospects for this summer depend largely upon the new corn crop.

If corn crop prospects continue favorable, the Bureau of Agricultural Economics said today, hog slaughter from June through September probably will be considerably smaller than in the corresponding period last year. An average corn crop will make possible the holding of hogs for finishing to heavier weights and the retention of sows for increasing production.

"The decrease in slaughter this summer will be about offset by the larger storage stocks of hog production on hand at the beginning of June than a year earlier, but consumer demand for hog products . . . probably will be more favorable than it was last summer," the Bureau stated in its current hog situation report.

Hog prices in May reached the highest level in nearly eight years, due mainly to a marked decrease in hog marketings. Inspected hog slaughter was the smallest for that month in more than forty years. Storage stocks
