HERE AND THERE

to feed the people, swift-flowing streams to water the lands that feed the people and forests full of game to add to their vegetable menu. And the creeks and the ocean were filled with fish, all manner of fish to be had for the taking.

It was thus that by fishing, by farming and hunting, that those forest settlers made a comfortable living from the fields and the forest and the streams of Carteret county.

Word spread, as word will now and as word did even then, about the Carteret paradise where the very land itself flowed with milk and honey, and soon this section became one of the most thickly populated in North Carolina.

Came the Revolutionary War. Carteret citizens were startled from their ideal existence of farming and hunting and fishing to answer the call to arms. And many from their ranks became heroes of first rank during the struggle with England. Monuments still stand in the cemeteries of the county to attest the bravery of some of this county's citizens.

For her cousin's, the Misses Laura and Elizabeth West of Warsaw, N. C.

Mr. Dollie Moore, of Charlotte, N. C., was a weekend guest of Mr. and Mrs. R. J. Chadwick, Sr.

There is the monument in the Beaufort cemetery erected to Admiral Otway Burns who captained a privateer during the struggle. On the large marble block is mounted a cannon from his ship, the "Snapdragon." And there is the grave of the British redcoat who was buried standing up, packs and all to carry his gun through the ages.

Came the Civil War. Carteret once more came to the fore, its numerous natural harbors furnished hideouts for ships of the South. Then it was that Emeline Pigott, the Mata Hari of the Confederacy, started her rise to fame in the profession of espionage.

Carteret county still retains those assets which made it a paradise for early settlers. And added to those assets now are beaches, bustling business, and modern highways which made it easily accessible. Fishing is a more lucrative profession here than ever before, the soil is fertile and game still abounds.
