It's Chronic — This Santa Claustrophobia

The spirit of Yuletide is closing in. It's later than you think—haven't you seen those little notices (usually tempered by cartoons) telling you emphatically that there are practically no shopping days left until Christmas?

It seems to me that either the years are getting shorter or that the periods between Christmases are shrinking. It seems but yesterday when I was looking over a whole mess of Christmas wrappings and ribbons, trying to decide what I could salvage for next year.

Nowadays you scarcely have exclaimed dutifully over a pair of gloves four sizes too small than you hear the postmaster general warning that the deadline for overseas Christmas packages is approaching very fast.

Personally, my annual attack of Santa Claustrophobia now has its onset in July, just when the thermometer is reaching record highs. There's always someone around who has just returned from Europe, California, Canada or some such place to announce with complacency and superiority that she has found the most wonderful little out-of-the-way shoppe where she did all her Christmas shopping in about 15 minutes. This not only fractures any feelings of friendship I might have had for the person, but it starts me wondering about my own Christmas shopping. However, I do nothing more than wonder.

Personally, I have always been a stout advocate of last-minute shopping. By Christmas eve, I always say, you are in just the right mood for shopping and it's fun to buck the crowds because most of the people have been to office parties and are in no mood for combat.

But because Christmas now comes much sooner than it used to, I have a distinct recollection of last Christmas eve. It was around 6 p.m. in the evening and I was running like a pursued fox from store to store trying to check off some 17 names remaining on my list.

"Next year," I said grimly, while elbowing a red-faced and determined gentleman from a vantage point at a perfume counter. "I will start my Christmas shopping really
