Vic Mature Goes After Samson Role in 1936, Lands It in 1950

In Paramount's Technicolor version of "Samson and Delilah," Victor Mature gets his revenge on a "Philistine" named Cecil B. DeMille.

Back in 1936, when DeMille was planning to film the Old Testament tale, public interest in the title roles had reached an unusual pitch. A member of the "public" at that time was an intense young man from Louisville, Kentucky, who had equally intense conviction that there was a place for him in Hollywood.

To that end, Victor Mature decided that the best way to crash the movies was to call attention to himself. He therefore bought a tent and pitched it in the heart of Hollywood—what's more, right in front of the offices of Cecil B. DeMille.

The Kentucky boy's one-night encampment was a fabulous bust. DeMille was unavoidably introduced to the young man, looked right through him, and then went about his business of temporarily abandoning plans for the production of "Samson and Delilah."

In 1950, however, when the producer had dusted off his "Samson" scenario, and had wearily tested hundreds of would-be strong-men for the role, he was forced to concede that the only man in the world

Hollywood Duplicates Night Club for "Sound Off"

Hollywood technicians went to great lengths to duplicate Hollywood's night spot, Ciro's for Columbia Pictures' new musical in Super-cinemascope, "Sound Off," starring Mickey Rooney.

Mickey appears in the comedy as a night club entertainer at the famed nitery, so propmen, designers, carpenters, electricians and others, whipped up an exact duplication of the place.

The most elaborate song and dance routine filmed at "Ciro's" is one in which Rooney does a spirited number with a bevy of beautiful six-foot tall chorines.

who could do justice to Samson was a chap named Victor Mature. And it seems as though DeMille was right—Mature's performance has been the talk of Hollywood.
