Magazine Article Features Clam Research at Beaufort

An article in the Dec. 30 issue of People Today, comments on work being done with radioactivity in connection with shellfish. Titled "Radioactive Clams," the article tells of cooperative efforts of the Fish and Wildlife Service and Duke University marine lab on Piver's Island, Beaufort, to grow bigger and better shellfish.

The lab has immersed clams, oysters, scallops, etc. in jars of sea water to which microscopic particles of radioactive plant food have been added, relates the article.

Geiger counters and similar equipment measure the radioactivity of particles before they are absorbed by the shellfish. These instruments also check on the transfer of radioactivity from the water to the shellfish as it feeds.

Clams radioactivated usually grow to several times the size of ordinary clams, the article states. This could open new fields for those who want bigger and better seafoods, chickens, steaks, etc., the article concludes.

The two-page story contains pictures of the apparatus used in the fishery experiments and a picture of Miss Molly Hopkins, of Beaufort, summer lab worker, holding a large radioactivated clam and a small ordinary one.
