Civil Defense Group Maps Plans For Evacuating People Via Highways

Raleigh, N. C. — The foundation has been laid for the orderly mass movement of civilian populations over North Carolina highways and details of a master traffic control plan are now in the hands of local law enforcement officials who have been warned that the next war will be fought on Main Street, U. S. A.

General Edward F. Griffin, director of the North Carolina Council of Civil Defense, points out that the importance of advanced planning to handle the greatest volume of traffic in this nation's history was the chief topic of the highly successful two-day Civil Defense Police Institute held at Chapel Hill June 23 and 24. It was attended by over 100 civil law enforcement officials and Military Police from throughout the state.

Nationally recognized authorities and state regional experts emphasized the urgent necessity of rural, urban and state police organizations working in closest cooperation to (1) plan for mass movement out of stricken areas (2) to continue this mass movement on through or around the smaller communities and (3) disperse it into sections of the state where food, shelter and other care will be made available to the homeless thousands.

Police Play Key Role

Present planning for the evacuation of big cities listed as enemy targets makes the role of the policeman one of the keystones of rural community law enforcement Civil Defense, and makes the officer bear a responsibility equal to the metropolitan police organizations, General Griffin points out.

Law enforcement officials were told they should begin immediately and create a flexible traffic control plan for their own community, no matter how small. They should then dovetail this plan into that of the county or their nearest neighboring community. Then these local plans should be coordinated into a master state-wide network of emergency highways to be strictly controlled for priority movement of people and critical equipment or supplies. The State Highway Patrol was suggested as the overall coordinating agency for the master plan.

Once the traffic control plan is agreed upon, each police jurisdiction should begin the selection, enlistment and training of auxiliary Civil Defense police to effectively control the routes. This will require at least 10 volunteers for each professional policeman, and volunteers should be recruited from among people who work or live near their assigned duty so they could immediately take up their posts at the first air raid warning, General Griffin adds.

Organization Essential

In warning that the next world war would be fought on Main Street, General Griffin told the law officers that a well organized Civil Defense might be the difference between life or death of this nation. "We face an enemy who has the ability to strike devastating blows at every major city—within the hour and without warning," he said. So long as that threat remains, we must be prepared for any eventuality, he added.
