Food Poisoning Strikes Most In Summer
 Summertime is picnic time but it's also the season when food poisoning takes its toll.
 According to Iola Pritchard, State College food conservationist, this poisoning may result from either conserved or fresh food.
 USDA researchers say that cooked food accounts for most cases of food poisoning in hot summer weather. And it's food cooked in advance and not promptly chilled or kept chilled that takes the heaviest toll. Though cooking destroys most bacteria, it won't protect the food from contamination after cooking if the food is not refrigerated.
 It's the stewed chicken that stood all night on the kitchen table in its broth, or the stuffed eggs that were tucked down into the picnic basket for several hours, or the custard or custard-filled cakes left standing at room temperature that may cause you trouble.

 Miss Pritchard says that food prepared in quantity for community picnics and family night suppers too frequently doesn't get proper refrigeration.
 If you're planning potato salad, fish or chicken salad as a part of your picnic menu, make sure that it is well chilled and kept cool until time to use. When preparing these recipes in large quantity, place the food into smaller containers for refrigeration. If a large bowl of salad is placed into the refrigerator, it may not chill rapidly enough to prevent spoilage.
 "Better not" are good words to keep in mind if you're debating whether or not to save some of that chicken salad left-over from the picnic. It's been standing out on the table several hours, spoilage may have occurred — spoiling that you can't always detect by sniffing or tasting.
