Work on Famed Grotto Continues

West Bend, Iowa (AP) — The job of finishing the world-famed Grotto of the Redemption that the Rev. P. M. Dobberstein started near St. Peter and Paul Church here 42 years ago falls to his long-time parishioner and helper, Matthew Scerensce.

Father Dobberstein, 81, a Roman Catholic priest, died last summer. Scerensce, 58, the priest's helper since the first stone was laid in 1912, knows more than anyone else about the millions of pieces of material from all parts of the world that have gone into the grotto.

He helped Father Dobberstein sort out the pieces and build it into an amazing layout of gateways and pathways to scenes of religious significance.

The priest, apparently with a premonition of his death, asked Scerensce to finish the grotto. Scerensce will not guess when it can be finished.

"We need petrified wood, white quartz and flint rock," he said. "These are costly items."

Contributions from parishioners and visitors provide revenue for materials in the grotto.
