Scientists Say Shellfish Can Be Grown in Ponds

On the subject of something to eat here's more about North Carolina's seafood industry, as seen through professorial eyes.

Dr. Melbourne Carrier, a "marine ecologist" (that's an academic expression for expert on growing seafood), made a speech recently on "The Growth of the Hard Clam."

Dr. Carrier revealed his experience in New York during the summers in growing clams. With other zoologists he has a place on Gardiners Island, off the tip of Long Island. On Gardiners Island is a salt water lake, called Home Pond. In home pond are thousands of clams and oysters, shrimp and other seafood.

The marine ecologists are studying their habits—the habits of the clams chiefly. Young clams are fed on pabulum. That's how carefully they are watched and nourished. Some of the oysters in Home Pond are a foot long, and up to 12 years of age. Some of the clams are every bit of 50 years old.

What results does Dr. Carrier expect?

He and his colleagues hope to show how all kinds of seafood can be grown in shallow ponds, closely connected with the sounds and oceans. The fishes and oysters and clams can be protected from natural enemies, so that they can thrive and become plentiful.

Then when the time comes that the land doesn't provide all the food the human race can eat, we can turn to the denizens of the deep—and the salt water ponds developed by Dr. Carrier of the University of North Carolina and other professors of matters affecting fish.

AIM Recognizes Phone Company

For the fourth consecutive year, Carolina Telephone and Telegraph Co. has been cited by the American Institute of Management for its excellence of management during 1955.

L. W. Hill, president of the company, was presented with the certificate of excellent management at the Sheraton-Blackstone Hotel in Chicago last week. The presentation was made by Jackson Martindell, president of the AIM.

The citation places the local telephone company on the 1956 list of excellent managements numbering 408 American and Canadian companies. Only two other North Carolina companies are included on the list.

The company was examined and judged on the following: economic function, corporate structure, health of earnings, service to stockowners, research and development, directorate analysis, fiscal policies, production efficiency, sales vigor and executive evaluation.
