When Mr. Conway got his glasses on, we were surprised to see tears in his eyes. In a husky voice he said, "Thank goodness for boys with eyes that are young and keen." Then he motioned for all of us to come closer, and we saw, to our surprise, that he had friendly eyes.

"Boys," he said, "over there under that tree the ground is covered with apples. Help yourself. I'm going to the house for a minute to get all those baseballs I've been keeping. They ought to last you all summer."

ward the chair, holding his hands out and feeling for the chair, as though he were almost blind.

"You know what?" exclaimed Red suddenly. "I'm going to look for Mr. Conway's glasses."

The rest of us went along, too, with Red leading. He called out, "Oh, Mr. Conway, we're not going to bother your apples—we're just going to find your glasses!"

The old man looked around and smiled just a little. "I'd be mighty obliged to you, son," he said. "I could hardly get back to the house without my glasses."

Red quickly found the glasses, and one of the other boys found the ball that had been knocked over the fence, and Red walked toward the old man. "Here's your glasses, sir," he said, "and here's the ball you were looking for."

It's Storytime

Red Akers' Home Run

Red Akers slashed out a home run, but instead of running, he just stood and watched the ball sail over the fence and land in the tall grass in Mr. Conway's apple orchard, where Mr. Conway was waiting, as usual. He had a big, old, wooden chair in which he could sit and lean back against an apple tree with his heavy, thick-lensed glasses on.

"Aw, shucks," Red Akers said, "I'm sorry. I didn't really aim to hit it over the fence." What he meant was that we couldn't ever be happy about hitting a home run, because every time a ball went over the fence, Mr. Conway would go after it and keep it.

Mr. Conway really wasn't mean, and even we boys could see his point, for we just didn't have enough will power or whatever it takes to pick up a ball without also filling our pockets with those fine red apples.

We were all about to leave the lot when Red Akers happened to notice something. "Look!" he exclaimed. "Mr. Conway is down on his knees, in the tall grass!" "He sure wants to break up this game, that's for certain," said one of the boys.

"That's not all of it," replied Red. "Looks like the old man has lost his glasses."

For a long time we stood and watched Mr. Conway feeling around in the grass, and then he seemed to give up and started to

Man Floods Hole in Yard And Nets Grown Badger

Phoenix, Ariz. (AP)—C. C. Sowers noticed a burrow in his front yard. He assumed it was made by a gopher, so he flooded the hole and waited for the animal to appear.

But the tiny gopher did not show up. Instead, out of the hole crawled a 30-pound, 30-inch long full-grown badger.
