Marine Drowns While Diving At Radio Island

the death of Doug Hammond, 21year-old Cherry Point Marine who drowned at Radio island Saturday afternoon, an accident. The Marine's body was pulled from the water at 4:55 p.m. after being located by Paul Norman, Morehead City skin diver.

According to the coroner, Hammand and a buddy, Peter C. Just, had gone to Radio island together to dive. They swam out to the rock jetty near the loading ramp and went down. Just decided that he wanted to move to the other side of the jetty and signalled Hammond to surface. He told the coroner that his signal was acknowledged.

Just said he thought Hammond followed him up, but when he reached the surface he couldn't see him. He started to look for him and when he could not locate him, called for help. Conducting the search were Norman and Claude Hull. Time of death was set at about 3:15.

Norman said the body was located about half way between the corner of the loading ramp and the jetty in water 25 feet deep. He said he removed the weight belt from the body before bringing it to the surface. The victim's diving gear, he said, was homemade.

No information on survivors of funeral arrangements were available at press time yesterday, but a wife and small child.
