

Government To Make Refuge For Wildfowl

- Agency Approves Move This Week
- Refuge to be Located At Cedar Island

Purchase of Cedar Island land as a national wildfowl refuge was approved this week in Washington by the Migratory Bird Conservation commission.

Amount of the acreage involved is reported at 16,200. It will be known as the Cedar Island National Wildfowl Refuge.

Walter Teich, president of the Carteret County Wildlife club, said Wednesday that the establishment of a wildfowl refuge on the island has been in the wind for two or three years.

Club officials have been aware that the federal government was interested in the project and encouraged the establishment of the refuge. He said surveyors have been at work in the area.

Odell Merrill, county register of deeds, said that he had no record in his office in the courthouse of any option on the land, however.

It is expected that steps toward acquisition will be taken by the Department of the Interior through the Atlanta office of the Bureau of Sports Fisheries and Wildlife.

Estimate of cost of the land has not been given. It is reported that most of it is owned by persons who do not live in this county.

The area will be developed to provide natural feed for waterfowl. According to law, up to 40 per cent of the refuge could be opened to hunters.

The county wildlife club has already established two small refuges in the county, one in the Salter Path area and one in the vicinity of Harkers Island.

It is pointed out that establishment of protected areas for wildfowl not only conserves the supply but also makes for better hunting in nearby areas.
