

State Court Rules Against Beaufort Plan

● Court Throws Whole
Thing Back to Board
● Decision Handed
Down Wednesday

The town of Beaufort has lost another round in its efforts to expand.

The state supreme court on Wednesday ruled that Beaufort amend its annexation ordinance to comply with state annexation laws. It specifically cited sewage, boundaries and requested "specific findings that the area to be annexed is developed for urban purposes."

The case was argued before the supreme court at Raleigh Sept. 5. Annexation proceedings have been in progress for almost two years. The Beaufort town board adopted an ordinance Jan. 11, 1960, annexing to the town areas to the north and east.

The following month, G. W. Huntley Jr. and others obtained an order restraining the town from carrying out its annexation plans.

The town deferred, but judge William J. Bundy, resident judge of the third judicial district, upheld the restraining order Feb. 26, 1960.

The town then proceeded to annex certain small areas on its perimeter already connected to town sewer lines, but located beyond the town limits.

Superior court judge Albert Cowper upheld the town in this action, but the petitioners appealed to the state supreme court. Gene Smith, attorney for those fighting annexation, said the town's entire proceedings in annexation were reviewed by the supreme court and the court's decision refers to all the town's efforts to annex by ordinance.

Efforts to expand the town by vote of people in the to-be-annexed areas have consistently failed.

40-Foot Dreamo Lu Burns Monday in Beach Channel

The $32,000 partyboat Dreamo Lu, Atlantic Beach, was swept yesterday morning by fire that almost destroyed the boat. J. E. Talton, owner, who was aboard at the time of the blaze, estimated that damage runs as high as 85 or 90 per cent. The inside of the 40-foot craft is gutted.

Mr. Talton said that the fire probably originated in the ignition system wiring. He was in the channel near the Blue Marlin motel, headed for the Morehead City yacht basin at about 7:30 a.m., when the fire broke out.

Mr. Talton, alone aboard the boat, said one of the Dreamo Lu's twin diesels quit and the other ran away, but he was able to get the boat ashore. People nearby called the Atlantic Beach fire department and the blaze was finally extinguished.

Mr. Talton says his loss is partially insured. The Dreamo Lu has operated here as a partyboat for the past two seasons.

Its owner also owns and operates Talton's motel, Atlantic Beach, where the Dreamo Lu is now tied up. Mr. Talton plans to rebuild the Dreamo Lu.

The craft measures 35 inches from keel to the tip of the top mast. The model was built in response to a request from Howard I. Chapelle, curator of the division of transportation at the Smithsonian. He wrote to Josiah W. Bailey of Morehead City in September.

Mr. Bailey prevailed upon "Captain Elmo" to build the model. Captain Elmo will be reimbursed for his efforts by W. C. Matthews of the Morehead City Drug Co.

The skiff has been named Alma, in honor of the boat, Alma, one-time sailing champion of the Morehead City waterfront. The Alma was owned by Capt. Gib Willis who sailed her in many a race and won practically all of them.

Before the model goes off to Washington, Mrs. Gib Willis and her grandson, Jimmy Howland,

The model also has little bags of sand as ballast. The sails were made by Mr. Bailey. All parts of the craft that move in a real spritsail work in the model.

Judge to Hear Case Against Bull Lines, Union, Crew at 10 Saturday

In the Pitt county courthouse, Greenville, at 10 a.m. Saturday, Judge William J. Bundy will hear testimony in the suit against the Bull Lines, the Seafarers' International union and personnel of the ship, Montauk Point.

The suit was filed Nov. 16 by Aviation Fuel Terminals, Morehead City. It seeks $75,000 in damages.

The action was brought when the tanker Montauk Point, owned by the Bull Lines, failed to clear the Aviation Fuel Terminals dock, Radio island, after discharging cargo Tuesday, Nov. 14.

The crew aboard the vessel claimed illness. Failure of the ship to move prevented normal operation of the fuel terminals, delayed unloading of the tanker Mission San Rafael and caused diversion of the Capt. Nicholas Sittas, a third tanker, to another port.

The Montauk Point finally sailed Friday, Nov. 17, but refused assistance from Morehead City harbor tugs operated by Carteret Towing Co. The towing company was being picketed that week by the Seafarers' union for failure to negotiate a contract regarding towing

East of Lane's furniture store, the car ran off the shoulder on the right, across a yard, knocked down concrete blocks on a vacant lot, then hit a brick fence and the corner of a house belonging to Charles O. Weaver, Greensboro.

Mrs. Dixon was taken to Morehead City hospital in the Bell-Munden ambulance. She was still in the hospital yesterday.

Montauk Point crewmen who said they were sick and unable to take the ship out are members of the Seafarers' union, an AFL-CIO organization. Crewmen were examined by a Morehead City doctor who said they were physically capable of manning the ship.
