GROWING A GARDEN

Growing a garden—whether it be in the backyard of the city or on the farm—is considered by the Famine Emergency Food Committee as one of the most important parts of the entire Emergency Food Program. M. D. Bailey, said the planting of Victory Gardens in 1946 to increase our food supply, and permit greater shipment of food items so critically needed by starving people of Europe and Asia.

"These people are victims of enemy invasion. Their harvest season is four months hence and in many sections of Europe, agriculture has been damaged by the worst drought in a century," Mr. Bailey asserted.

"In releasing more wheat, fats, oils, and other needed foods for shipment to these starving people, Victory Gardens will help immeasurably in making good these commitments; assuring adequate supplies here at home; and reducing the overload on transportation facilities," he said.

In view of a possible shortage of tin and steel that may limit the commercial production of certain canned foods, Mr. Bailey recommended careful planning of the garden to assure fresh vegetables during the summer months and extra amounts for canning for family winter stocks.

The President and the Secretary of Agriculture have called for full support again this year by the Victory Gardeners. It is expected that all Tar Heels will answer this call most willingly.
