EFFECT OF NITROGEN ON PASTURE MIXTURES

Pastures are the cheapest source of livestock feed, and in this period of scarce feed must provide a large portion of the animals daily food requirements. In view of this situation interesting experiments have been made to determine fertilization practices for pastures, especially with nitrogen, by the Agronomy Department of State College.

To get the most good grazing possible from a pasture it must be treated as a crop. Plenty of lime, phosphate and potash should be applied to provide a high level of fertility. What about nitrogen? D. S. Chamblee, R. L. Lovvorn, and W. M. Woodhouse, agronomy specialists, answer this question by giving the results from numerous experiments which they have conducted.

Nitrogen applications are very effective in increasing early spring grazing and in the establishment of grasses in the sod, but in many cases grasses increased at the expense of the legumes in the mixture. Lespedeza was especially depressed by added nitrogen.

The use of nitrogen as a rule is not very effective in increasing the total yield or protein content of grass-legume sods. The main effect is on time of growth rather than amount of growth.

HYBRID CORNS SHOW NO BARREN STALKS

One of the principal reasons why hybrid corn produces larger yields than open pollinated corn is due to the absence of barren stalks.

Dr. R. P. Moore, seed improvement expert of the Agricultural Experiment Station at State College, suggests that farmers make checks on their corn this summer where they are growing both hybrid and open pollinated corn.

The hybrid should produce an ear on every stalk, with many stalks producing more than one ear. Stand is very important and the number of plants per acre is often the deciding factor in large yields per acre, where the crop is given full fertilization. Barren stalks will be found in the open pollinated corn, especially poor ones.

Just any hybrid corn is not a guarantee of good yields. While one hybrid may be well suited to one section of North Carolina,

IN LOVING MEMORY OF OUR MOTHER AND GRANDMOTHER, MRS. IDA AUSTIN

You are gone, dear Mother, but never will we forget you. In our hearts is your picture more precious than gold. It is the picture of our Mother, whose memory never grows old. Life doesn't seem the same since you've been gone. But the love in our hearts will never fade away. In life we loved you dearly and in death we do the same. But Jesus gently whispered, we heard Him call your name. Just as the sun was setting at the close of the day. Our heavenly Father gently took our Mother away. But we know that you and father are happy with Jesus above. By your children, Mrs. Porter Proffitt, sisters and brothers.

NATIONAL FOOD PRESERVATION WEEK

July 15-22 has been designated as National Food Preservation Week. See that no food goes to waste on your farm. Food may be preserved by salting, brining, curing, canning or dry

During the last 30 years prices of cows have doubled, while prices for horses have just about been cut in half.

Methods for doing each of these may be found in the County Agents' office.
