THE SCANDAL OF EVELYN NESBIT

On the night of June 25, 1906, a real-life drama was climaxed in the theatre atop New York's newly-built Madison Square Garden when its designer, the noted architect Stanford White, was shot and killed by the millionaire playboy, Harry K. Thaw over the love of a famous beauty. The subsequent trial exposed a sensational series of scandals that 50 years later, are still a prime source of interest and controversy.

It was inevitable that this drama would eventually be the subject of a motion picture. Of the principals, only Evelyn Nesbit Thaw, the turn-of-the-century beauty famed as the Gibson Girl, is still living. It is with her help and the material based on the court records and on the book "The Girl in the Red Velvet Swing" by Charles Samuels that Twentieth Century-Fox has fashioned its CinemaScope screenplay, which will be shown tonight and Friday at the Yancey Theatre, starring Ray Milland, Joan Collins and Farley Granger.
