TELL US YOUR PROBLEM AND LET US TRY TO HELP OTHERS IN SOLVING THEIRS. BY JOHN and JANE STRICKLAND

TOMMY JENSEN'S teacher was coming often enough to the home of his parents in Jacksonville, Florida, to give those elders concern. Tommy played truant. Tommy got several thrashings because of his truancy. But Tommy still played truant. He wasn't a bad boy at home. In fact, he wasn't bad in school—when ever he was there. He got his lessons; it seemed little trouble for him to learn or to recite them. His homework was taken care of promptly, and in time for Tommy to have happy periods of play before bedtime. WHY didn't Tommy want to go to school? He didn't seem to know the answer himself. Mr. Jensen himself had always been interested in history, a subject in which Tommy had shown more interest than in most of his school subjects. Mr. Jensen went into a huddle with the teacher. Might Tommy, when he finished his school work ahead of time, apply himself to gathering some facts for his father. The baffled teacher was ready to try practically anything. So Tommy went to school every day armed with an additional book—a history book. And Tommy came home every afternoon with quite a list of interesting facts on what had happened in the world. Tommy no longer played truant. All because Tommy's father had discovered why Tommy's great fault persisted. A little understanding had done what many thrashings had shown no signs of ever achieving.

THE BIGGEST MISTAKE By Fran Pachter

JUDITH had arrived at the resort a bit on edge. Her usual serenity had been ruffled by the unprecedented demand of her husband for a divorce. She dismissed his sudden rebellion as a form of temporary insanity and felt sure that given time he would reconsider and beg her forgiveness. Surety within herself told her that he'd miss her deft handling and finesse that had brought about his success. He had been a plodder, hiding his talent and ability, fearful of demanding his rightful recognition. It had been her clever molding and manipulation along with knowing the right people that had earned him his place. Judith dismissed as inconsequential his angry outburst when he'd said, "I want a wife and children, not a manager." To Judith, capable and sure of herself, it would have been preposterous to ever think there might be another woman involved. Her strategy lay in absencing herself and give him time to think, this combination she felt sure would sway him. In her own good time she would let him know her whereabouts. Let him slump a bit, revert to his old ways. It came as quite a shock to Judith to learn that Randy had not slumped, also that he was aware of her whereabouts and content to let her be. Before she could properly digest this unexpected reaction, she received divorce papers. For the first time in her life, Judith was taken back and at a loss as to plan. Had she so completely misjudged her husband? Had he been serious when he'd shouted denunciation of their life together? How could he manage without her? She realized now that not contesting the suit had been a serious mistake. It hit her with tremendous impact the day the decree was granted. Out of the blue she found herself no longer a wife but a divorcee, a situation not to her liking. Failure in anything to Judith was bitter and news that Randy was already seeing another woman sent her flying back to New York. A widow with a child of five, a woman best described as wholesome and fresh looking, but lacking chic and style. A far cry from the elegance of Judith and to her mind minor competition. She saw them together at Randy's favorite club. It sickened her to see Randy fawn over the little girl. Memory of Randy's love of children and her denial armed her with a weapon. She dressed with care the day of their pre-arranged date armed with her secret weapon and knowing she looked her best. Conversation was casual until the meal was over; Judith took the initiative toward personal conversation by saying, "I'm sure Randy that by now you regret your foolish impulsiveness. Let's try again. We'll ferry and have a child and life will be as before." "I made no mistake, Judith and life will not be as before, not for you and I. I had better tell you, I am getting married." Judith whitened with anger at his abrupt refusal and she lashed out at him vindictively. "I'll pull my friends away from you and you'll have nothing. You'll become once again an obscure nobody." Randy spoke quietly, "It doesn't matter. I am leaving New York to set up practice in Iowa. You know I always wanted to practice in a small town." "Fool! You blind stupid fool. To give up all this for a mundane existence. How can you?" Judith's anger and disbelief brought a chuckle to Randy. "It's not me that's blind, Judith. It's you. I hope someday you wake up to what really matters in life, but I'm afraid you won't." She watched him leave, aware that she had lost something precious, a quality of life Randy had and she could have shared. Hope stirred in her heart that someday she too might have another chance and be smart enough to hold onto it.
