serve its purpose. The careful neither party, during the camhost or hostess will make sure paigning, advocated any major changes in basic farm legislation, other than the dispute over price that ash-trays, larger than the postage-stamp size, are placed support levels. Price supports will again be the where they will be convenient to big farm issue when the 85th Conall smokers.

gress convenes in January, but that was to be expected, regardless of which party won the election. It will be a renewal of the battle between backers of rigid and backers of flexible props. Except for price supports, there are no big differences between Re-publicans and Democrats on farm programs and policies. Virtually all of the major farm laws are the result of agreements between congressional leaders of the two parties. There will be no change in acreage allotments for next year. Cotton and wheat allotments were. announced prior to the election. Other allotments will be set in accordance with rules included in present laws

There is to be no change in the emphasis on expanding exports of farm commodities. We're spending, lending or giving away, at the rate of $3 billion a year, to finance a world-wide program for disposal of our surpluses, and there is no thought of changing that in 1957.

The soil bank program will be continued, although there are indications that amendments will become a subject for congressional debate. There will be moves to "liberalize" the program, including provisions for raising some of the payment rates and permitting late of land threatened by drought or floods.

Measures to strengthen farm inome, and especially that of small and family-size farmers, will be emphasized by the President in his January message to Congress. While Democrats and Republicans may not agree on methods, there will be no disputing the objective. Soil conservation and special measures to ease the effect of periodic droughts in the Great Plains states will get bi-partisan support, Those problems are recognized by leaders of both parties in Congress as among the most urgent to be considered.

Research to develop new industrial uses for farm products will be pushed. Special committees of experts have been working on that since Congress, earlier this year, authorized a study to develop a program costing up to $100 million a year.

The Brannan Plan for remoying most price supports and then making direct "income" payments to farmers was junked six years ago, by a Democratic Congress and President, and hasn't the chance either free or at reduced prices, to low-income families. That was done during the depression '30's.
