High Schools Compete for Training Room

A public service campaign to stimulate action towards greater prep football safety has been launched by one of the nation's leading manufacturers and distributors of training supplies. The complete suite of athletic training room furniture and equipment (pictured above) is being offered as first prize in a coast-to-coast essay competition open to more than 11,000 high school coaches. This competition is the cornerstone of the campaign sponsored by the Bike Division of the Kendall Company. Above, Paul German, representing Bike, points out one of the pieces of equipment — a whirlpool bath—to Tom Heallon, Northwestern University trainer. Whirlpool baths will be given to ten second-place winners, and more than 1,100 other prizes of equipment will be given to runners-up. Entrants will be asked to submit a statement of why every high school should have a well-equipped training room. According to German, fewer than 10 per cent of the high schools have such a room now. "Through this competition, we hope to get a majority of the schools, and booster clubs and dads' clubs too, thinking in this direction. Proper protection of vulnerable parts of the body and proper and prompt diagnosis and treatment of injuries go hand-in-hand with good rules, good player equipment and good sportsmanship in football safety," he said.
