A soft answer turneth away wrath: But grievous words stir up anger.

A merry heart maketh a cheerful countenance: But by sorrow of the heart the spirit is broken.

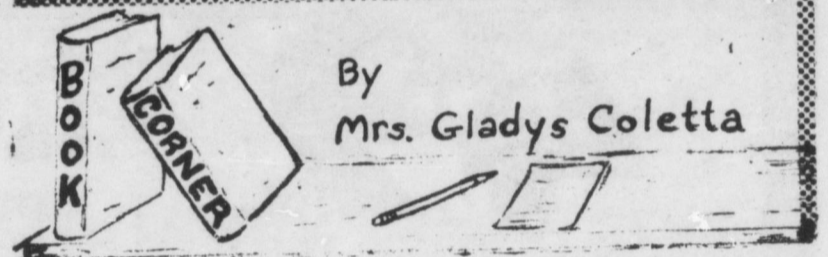

All the days of the afflicted are evil: But he that is of a merry heart hath a continual feast.

Better is little with fear of the Lord

Than great treasure and trouble therewith.

Better is a dinner of herbs where love is

Than a stalled ox and hatred therewith.

Should Doctors Play God?
By Dr. Claude A. Frazier. 1971. Pp. 176. Broadman Press, Nashville, Tennessee.

"The physician finds his freedom in his fetters, in the symbolic codes that assign him his role and render it tolerable to make judgments involving life and death." This statement appears in the book Should Doctors Play God? compiled by Dr. Claude A. Frazier of many articles written by his numerous friends.

"To be or not to be" is the theme, more or less, of the book. Whether the doctors realize it or not, they are constantly playing God as they prolong life with their medications, vaccines, and treatments. So, the book asks, why should they then object to shortening the span of life, when necessary? All this and many more questions are raised, as the authors discuss the physical, mental, emotional and spiritual problems of the human body.

Hence, each part of the body is considered as a contributing part of the whole--from the head, to the heart, to the lungs, to the sex organs, and to the urinary tract. None should be overlooked in the part they play in the overall health of an individual. We are burying our heads in the sand if we think otherwise.

Moreover, to meet the great science-technology advances of the future, we are ill prepared by our ethical heritage. In the days ahead we will be reaching constantly into the moral lore of the Christian community in quest of resources for decision-making. Our doctors will be placed more and more in the future with the dilemma of playing God. As laypeople, we must bank our trust in their judgment, remembering that "their strength will be as the strength of ten, if their hearts are pure".
