Galifianakis On Busing "Undecided"

1. Mr. Galifianakis did not sign the anti-busing petition.

Sixty other Congressmen did. They sent a strong anti-busing petition to the U. S. Supreme Court.

Mr. Galifianakis, who says he is against busing, refused to sign the petition.¹

Lots of politicians say they are against busing.

Actions speak louder than words.

Mr. Galifianakis failed to act.

2. Mr. Galifianakis is SOMETIMES against busing.

In another election year, Mr. Galifianakis introduced a supposedly "anti"-busing bill.²

It was a weak bill. So weak, say leading attorneys who have studied it, that it would have played right into the hands of pro-busing federal judges.

After the election, Mr. Galifianakis forgot about the bill. It died in committee.

This year an anti-busing bill came to the House floor for a vote.

A political reporter who was there wrote:

"Nick Galifianakis, whose voting record became more conservative when he announced for the Senate, seemed undecided on that vote. He picked up several red and green ballots and shuffled them nervously, pacing back and forth in front of the two aisles. After conferring with a dozen or more members and reading the amendment, he finally marched slowly up the left aisle with his green ballot."³

3. Jesse Helms is against forced busing.

He has always opposed forced busing—from the very beginning. He has never been namby-pamby about it. He will fight to stop forced busing—by constitutional amendment, if that's what it takes.

His stand against busing is one reason so many pro-busing editors are against him. They know where Jesse Helms stands—against busing.

Period.
