

For And About Homemakers

By Mary M. Deyton
 What are Little Children Made Of? Rearing children is a tough job. It takes energy, maturity, knowledge, and perhaps, most of all, guts. Knowledge can come from understanding the growth and development patterns of children, homemakers learned in attending meetings of Extension Homemakers Clubs this month. For example, parents need to realize that growth is a personal matter; that each child grows in his own way and at his own rate. If there is one thing a three-year-old child can't be, it's a five-year-old. This growth comes from within. Parents can encourage or hinder, but the driving forces that push a child to grow physically, emotionally and intellectually are carried inside him. So the parent's job is to clear the track, guide the child with loving acceptance and—relax. Parents need to realize that a child's growth is gradual and orderly, but uneven, and that growth has certain characteristics common at particular stages. For example, from birth to two years, a child's main concern is trust. He is completely dependent on others but if his needs are met, he learns to trust his environment. The two-year-old, however, wants to know "will you let me be me?" He's curious which is fortunate, because he has a lot to learn. He's also possessive and changeable. He may clamor for a toy and indifferently toss it aside when he gets it. The two-year-old needs the security of certain limitations placed on his behavior, but he needs enough freedom to develop his will and not always to expect defeat. The three-year-old is fairly peaceful. He generally tries to please because he likes adult approval and will seek attention and sympathy from adults. He's more civilized than a two year old. The four-year-old is usually bossy and boastful, asks questions and talks constantly. He has a strong need for companionship and will alibi to protect himself and his friends when they get into trouble. The five-year-old wants to try out his ideas. He is a joy to adults, he loves to talk with, run errands for and help his parents. He's sensitive to praise, dependable, serious and business like and likes to feel independent. But when he's with his friends, he needs supervision. He tattles, hits, pushes and is a poor group member. Knowing what behavior to expect from a child at certain ages may help parents offer guidance in a constructive, helpful manner. BOOK CORNER BY Mrs. Gladys Coletta

The Last Years Of A Rebel by Elizabeth Salter. 1967. Pp. 203. Houghton Mifflin Co., Boston, Mass.

"Dame Edith does live up the English scene a bit." So spoke the English critics of the modern poet, Dame Edith Sitwell, concerning a literary feud with this most controversial lady of letters. The glowing accounts of her battles with the press, in which she gave no quarter and expected none, are related in The Last Years Of A Rebel, by Elizabeth Salter, Dame Edith's young Australian secretary.

In spite of Dame Edith's scathing remarks, she reserved her snobbery as a weapon against the snobbish; it had no bearing on her affections which could be gained as readily by a housemaid as by a duchess. Surrounded at her eccentric tea parties by the great and not so great—from a manicurist to a bank clerk—she entertained, she listened, and she commented. At no time did she talk down to her guests. Basically, Dame Edith was a very human woman who, after so many years of fame, was still reaching out for sympathy and affection.

Moreover, fame had not come easily—only after a lifetime of battle for recognition. The result was that it endeared her to all struggling young writers and artists. As always, when she came upon what she regarded as great talent, Dame Edith put her offers of help into practice, and promoted their endeavors at her famous tea parties, luncheons and exhibitions.

Although Dame Edith was most unpredictable and a creature of contradictions, the English loved her all the more. They saw her as a character who refused to conform, thus evoking their seal of approval. It goes without saying that Thoreau had her (as well as others) in mind when he stated: "If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer. Let him step to the music which he hears, however measured and far away."
