The Autobiography of Miss Jane Pittman, by Ernest J. Gaines. 1971. Pp.244. The Dial Press, N.Y.

She lived through slavery. The Civil War. The Civil Rights Movement. She lived to be 110. Yet she never lived at all—except as a typical slave of the Old South. A purely fictitious character. Such is the story of Jane Pittman, as told by Edward J. Gaines in The Autobiography of Miss Jane Pittman.

"Go down, Moses, 'way down in Egypt land. Tell old Pharaoh to let my people go." Old Pharaoh in this case is the white man of yesterday (the Civil War), and also, the white man of today (the Civil Rights Movement). Moses is typified by Abraham Lincoln with the first emancipation proclamation and also, by Martin Luther King, who died for the negro's second freedom. In between were leaders of lesser stature to inspire the negro onward.

Miss Jane was one of the lesser leaders, working humbly behind the scenes to free her race. Her life spans a century of change that unfolds her griefs, triumphs, and above all, her enduring courage. The author first depicts Jane as a slave girl of nineteen years on a Southern plantation, forced to serve water on the same day during the Civil War to both retreating Confederate troops and attacking Union soldiers. From there he takes her through the war years, the period of Reconstruction, and her participation in the birth of the Civil Rights Movement. Through it all Jane remained a bulwark of strength to support those who faltered.

for television, this novel will long be remembered. After watching and hearing Jane with her rasping voice, poor eyesight, and shuffling gait at the age of 110, the viewer is ready to agree with Milton who wrote: "They also serve who only stand and wait."
