An immunized kid means a healthy home

Back-to-school means kids meeting kids, dribbling, drooling, achooing and generally passing off on other kids whatever disease they happen to have at the moment. The exchanging of "germs' among our youngsters in school is just the begin-tions. Childhood infec-ning. For when they come tions spread like wildfire home from class they're right in our faces, too, breathing, snorting and wheezing those new-found journeyman germs.

Recently I placed an appeal in Folk-Ways for information concerning the use of "toothbrushes" or "chewing sticks" as an aid to cleaning the teeth.

A follow-up letter from the Washington University School of Dental Medicine indicates that the information is needed as part of a world-wide study of this dying habit. The the Dental chairman of Microbiology Department, Memory Elvin-Lewis, reports that student survey. teams have been used quite successfully in West Africa in obtaining information on chewing sticks. He writes:

"I am especially interested in obtaining as much ethnobotanical information as possible regarding their use (chewing sticks). It is important to know the reasons for the types of plants preferred and especially if any have other medicinal uses.

"I know that Dogwood, Sweet Gum, and Hickory are popular, but to what degree? In our survey in Africa, for example, at least 80 species are known but only a very few are used by the majority of the population.

"It would also be interesting to know how the habit was taught and at what age it was considered important. In this regard differences may exist between juvenile and adult preferences."

A casual broaching of the subject to friends this week brought responses which suggest that a variety of species were also used in Appalachia and in the South in general.

Ruby Akers, a Boone resident who grew up in Mississippi, remembers the blackgum as a favorite tooth or chewing-stick: "We always broke off the twig or stick at the knot, for it seemed to have a better flavor there and would eventually shred into many fine particles which could be used like a brush for both teeth and gums. I think we also used poplar and hickory, but blackgum was our favorite.'

Clarence Bunch, a transplanted Missourian, remembers very vividly that willow branches were first choice in his youth: "I guess there's good reason to remember: we cut our tooth-sticks off the switches our mother used on us when we got into trouble."

Watauga County native

Nadine Hampton's recollections are somewhat similar: "We used birch--black birch-almost altogether. My mother would send us up on the hill to cut birch switches when we were bad and we cut our sticks about three or four inches long from them. We always left a knot about a half inch from the end and feathered the wood into shreds back to the knot. Why birch? Because it tasted so good."

John West, poet and novelist from Wilkes County, remembers that mahogany twigs were the favorite in his area: "We had the only mahogany tree in the whole area in our yard, and younguns used to come from miles around to break off the limbs for chewing sticks.

"The bark and the wood were sweet in themselves, but we used to add extra flavor by grinding sassafras roots into powder and mixing this with blackgum, birch, dogwood, spicewood, and the twigs from various fruit trees, especially apple. Matter of fact I'm still prone to do a bit of blackgum nibbling, given the opportunity!"

sugar. We dipped our chewing sticks into this mixture and pretended we were dipping snuff like the old women in our neighborhood." My own memories turn to

Letter To The Editor

Mike Mitchell's "Last Farewell" to Yancey Railroad's engine, "Blackie," was one of the most unique and refreshing articles I've read in many a day. He made Blackie live and breathe! I wanted to hug and kiss her good-bye and tell her how much I love and appreciate her so badly I could stomp. I think I shall go to Alabama and do just that. Anybody want to go with me?

You know the more sentiment we feel and express for all things, even the inanimate, the more we have for our fellowman and for God.

Some talent you have there, Mr. Mitchell. Keep it up.

Sincerely yours, Gladys M. Sandlin
